Dear You—

Happy November!

This is the part of the year when time accelerates and it's finals time before you know it. We hope our loved ones can take a breath and not get too caught up in the chaos: grades, travel, inconsistent weather, life drama. You matter the most.

You can borrow a zine kit at the library circulation desk so you can make your own zine and not be a Zombie.

Good luck everyone!

"I feel like there is a huge difference in how nuns are thought of, depending on if you were raised catholic/ went to catholic school or not. This zine is so incredibly relatable (and hilarious) because it doesn't shy away from telling the truth of how nuns act and speak, especially in schools."

Domestic Violence Awareness Month Zines

Taking the First Step : Ten Suggestions to People Called Out for Abusive Behavior by Wispy Cockles Zines C635t 2019

Available online on CLIO*

This informational zine details steps for those who are accused of abusive behaviors to take accountability and move forward. Advice includes tips for communicating, taking responsibility, and responding to accusations. The color-printed zine is adapted from an article originally written in the January/February 2002 issue of Clamor Magazine with illustrations by Flynn Nichols. — Nayla Delgado

Voces : a zine by the Voices Against Violence Project : no. 3. by Noemi Martinez Zines M368v no.3

Available online on CLIO*

Voces is a compilation zine with stories, poems, and photographs from people of color, indigenous folks, trans people and queer survivors of domestic violence, sexual violence and sexual assault. Included topics are healing from trauma, transformative words used as a healing mechanism, enabling healing, life after trauma, self help guides and resources, self healing, forgiveness and collective healing.

Disloyal to feminism : abuse of power & control within the domestic violence shelter system by Emi Koyama Zines K693d 2003

As a survivor of domestic violence and an ex-employee of a domestic violence shelter, Emi Koyama has had first-hand experience with the exclusion and abuse of power within the shelter system supposedly created to empower survivors. She employs the personal stories of women in shelters, scholarly articles, and historical data to articulate the need for a restructuring of the shelter system, emphasizing harm-reduction and a balance of powers rather than the present paternalistic and/or radical-feminist utopian structure.

Pandemic Bird Log

Finding Joy in Nature

forever - whatever

Linda Suza Kawano

2021

Jan 19 Lots of goldfinches today
The nuthatch was here many times
Bunches of squirrels too and Juncos
Then at 3:03 pm a Hawk! spotted in the red pine, who flew from pine into the arbutus in the back of the yard. In an instant he/she flew out of the tree westward over our house. Blossom was back at 9:00 pm

I first read this zine during my Wednesday morning, 9am shift, when I was abstracting. It was sunny and I was the only one in the archives workroom.

This zine is beautifully contemplative and meditative reflection on the author's connection to nature during the pandemic. Keeping a record of all the birds that flew into her yard that day, Linda Kawano tracks the changing seasons and the slow passing of time.

What struck me the most about this zine was how quiet the zine is. The zine simply lists the birds that the author encounters. There is nothing flashy about the writing or the illustrations, but Kawano's dedication to finding joy despite the challenges of the pandemic is inspiring. The dedication to finding joy in everyday life was moving. It's a hopefully zine that is situated in both present joys and looking forwards to a brighter future.
